This fixed-term position would be ideal for an economist who is interested in learning about careers in an international organization and about the IMF's work.

The main tasks will be monitoring and analyzing macroeconomic, financial sector, and structural developments; preparing reports and presentations; and assisting in the preparation of seminars and conferences. Opportunities for economic research may also arise.

Necessary qualifications include the following: high-caliber graduate training in economics or finance, ideally at the PhD level, with recent graduates very welcome to apply; advanced knowledge of econometrics, related software packages and standard economic databases; proficiency in Excel and presentation software; excellent spoken and written English and excellent command of Japanese, with effective verbal and written communication skills; accuracy and attention to details; ability to work in a team as well as independently and to multi-task under pressure.

The salary and benefits would be commensurate with background and experience and will be set with reference to the Japanese domestic market.
