The sensitivity of net flows to an unanticipated U.S. monetary tightening is greater for directly financially exposed emerging market economies that are more globally financially integrated and have shallower financial markets, more flexible exchange rates, or lower domestic growth (compared with financially unexposed economies). A similar pattern holds for the sensitivity of net flows in response to a realized U.S. monetary tightening.