When financial market conditions are benign, globalization facilitates external adjustment, as this can now be achieved with smaller exchange rate changes and smaller increases in real interest rates. Under globalization, output losses are also smaller in the short run, except in emerging Asia.

Source: IMF staff calculations.