Inflation has been moving up, reflecting the sharp recovery of commodity prices and emerging capacity constraints. However, core inflation remains low in the major advanced economies. In emerging market economies, by contrast, it has risen significantly but now shows signs of moderating. With commodity prices forecast to stabilize or retreat, headline inflation can be expected to decline. In emerging market economies, underlying inflation pressure is likely to continue to stay relatively elevated because of strong activity and relatively low unemployment.