Policy-uncertainty shocks in the United States and Europe have a negative effect on real activity in other regions, with the magnitude, persistence, and statistical significance differing across regions. In general, the effect of U.S. policy-uncertainty shocks tends to be slightly bigger and more persistent than that of European policy-uncertainty shocks, and U.S. shocks affect Europe more than vice versa.