More resilient economies experienced gross inflows and gross inflow volatility similar to less resilient economies. However, reflecting greater buffering of these inflows with offsetting gross outflows, more resilient economies had smaller and more stable current account balances on average over the past 10 years. This is reflected in a better, although not on average positive, net international investment position.